

Based on a survey of over 1250 Kansas high school educators, did you know

- Only 42% of Kansas high school teachers who don't coach have received any type of concussion training from their district.
- Only 36% of Kansas high school teachers report that their high school or school district has a Return to Learn plan in place for their students. Out of this 36%, only 23% have been provided a copy of the plan.
- Less than 19% of Kansas high school teachers report that their high school or school district provides any type of training to review academic accommodations for concussed students.
- Only 35% of Kansas high school teachers who don't coach are aware of the KSHSAA concussion guidelines.
- Only 44% of Kansas high school teachers report that their school has a staff member assigned to authorize academic accommodations for students recovering from a concussion.
- 34% of Kansas high school teachers report seeing decreases in academic performance in students after a concussion
- 45% of Kansas high school teachers report observing students return to the classroom with learning difficulty after a concussion.
- 49% of Kansas high school teachers who don't coach previously had a student in their class inform them of suffering a blow to the head in a sporting event recently and are currently experiencing signs/symptoms of a concussion.